deal."

The causes of the present disorder and unrest reach far back and deep down; the war merely accelerated de-velopments already under way. At the bottom lies the popular discontent, which has been growing for years, which has been growing for years, with the economic arrangements of society; a feeling that they are unjust and undemocratic; a feeling that while there have been enormous developments in machinery and business organization, the social and political structure has not kept pace with them.

unrestricted social organization Produced Wonderful Tool.

Produced Wonderful Tool.

Groups everywhere that felt oppressed, or wanted protection, or privilege, organized to get it. Capitalists organized, combined, trustified—and succeeded beyond the dreams of avarice. Labor organized and became powerful. Prohibitionists organized and dried up the country. Women organized and got the vote. Voluntary social organization has for the last twenty-five years been humanity's magic wand. It would do anything! It has built up a wonderful technique of its own. It knows how to get money, use propaganda, influence elections, force legislators. It is a wonderful tool—used sometimes for good purposes, sometimes for wholly selfish purposes.

Consider more specifically labor organization. I remember well the little, dismal, smoky rooms over saloons that used to represent the typical labor union headquarters of twenty-five years ago. I thought of the contrast the other day when I visited the fine hall—it cost several hundred thousand dollars—built by the street car men's union of Chicago.

Once the movement demonstrated its success in improving the conditions of life for working men—and it was the only way they had—it spread like wiidfire. I was amazed the other day to look at the lists of unions affiliated with one of the principal city central bodies; school teachers look at the lists of unions affiliated with one of the principal city central bodies; school teachers, actors, newspaper writers, architects, nurses. They are all coming in. Public employes are com-ing in; policemen, postmen. The move-ment is even penetrating the rarified at-mosphere where authors and college pro-fessors are supposed to dwell.

Standardized Contracts.

I received a communication the other day from the Authors' League, of which I am a member, that read strangely like many a trade union document—only the pantsmakers and hodcarriers have had longer experience and know better how to do it. We authors have gone at the business in our "labor union" of standardizing contracts, making better terms with our employers—the predatory and shamefully plutocratic publishers—and working for more pay and better living conditions.

"As a result of six years of unremitting effort," remarks this document, "the author enjoys a new standing and a greater security than at any other time in the history of the profession."

You see what our union does! We're better off than ever Shakespeare was, or Dickens or Thackeray, or Cervantes, or Goethe. We're securer; we have a new standing, and organization did it!

I live in a college town, and all about are college professors. They complain bitterly of cold and hunger and long hours of work and low pay; I hear that their living conditions rae being investigated not only by the government, but by at least one foundation. The union is the only remedy!

One reason why political life has reached such a low ebb in America—why politics attracts so poor a quality of leadership—is because vital men who really want something done feel surer of getting it through outside organizations than through the indirect and cumbrous machinery of politics.

If this rate, however, were the only expression of the public interest, the outlook would be dark indeed. But it is not. While there are powerful forces using the fine burst of passion for a "new deal," for "public rights," for "law and order" in America to serve their own selfish interests—using it as a smoke-screen to conceal their own purposes—there is, it seems to me, a new sense abroad that law and order must be based upon a real understand-
